

ANTLER-BACKED · PROMPT-DRIVEN VIDEO EDITING

Two filmmakers built ChatCut. The homepage reads like a spec sheet.

A clever editor, hiding the craft that made it. Five ways the marketing wins or loses — the CLEAR read.

C L E A R
CENTRICITY LEGIBILITY EDGE ARGUMENT RECALL

CENTRICITY

Is the page about the customer — or the company?

THE READ

"Tell it what you want and it figures out how" gestures at the user, but the page mostly narrates features.

THE FIX

Open on the creator's problem. "You shot two hours. You need two minutes. Just say so."

LEGIBILITY

Can a stranger tell what you do, and who for?

THE READ

"Text-based editing for your talking-head content" is concrete. The other seven hero headings dilute it.

THE FIX

Keep the one line that lands and cut the rest. One promise beats eight.

EDGE

Do you say why you — not the alternative?

THE READ

Living inside ChatGPT and Claude is interesting. The page never says why that beats Descript or CapCut.

THE FIX

Name the rival and win. "The only editor that lives where you already write."

ARGUMENT

A point of view — or just a feature list?

THE READ

Two filmmakers built this, and it shows nowhere. No thesis about editing, creators, or craft.

THE FIX

Put the filmmakers on the page. Two editors who got sick of the timeline have a point of view. That's the story.

RECALL

Will anyone remember you tomorrow?

THE READ

"ChatCut" is descriptive to the point of disappearing, and the identity is competent stock SaaS.

THE FIX

The name works. Give it a look a filmmaker would recognize as one of their own.

THE THROUGH-LINE

Two filmmakers built a genuinely clever editor, then described it like a spec sheet. The craft that made it is nowhere on the page. And the craft is the pitch.

This is a 60-second read from the 100 Yards brand engine. Want one on your site?

100yards-readout.netlify.app